RESIDENTIAL & COMMERCIAL DEPRECIATION

DEPRECIATION

Depreciation is the loss of value from any and all reasons. The appraiser is expected to recognize and estimate the extent of this loss for each property that he appraises. There are primarily three factors which contribute to depreciation: physical depreciation, functional obsolescence, and economic obsolescence. Physical depreciation results from the passing of time, the action of the elements, and from wear and tear. The Appraiser must use his judgment in making an opinion of how much loss in value the property has accrued through physical depreciation.

Ordinarily, physical depreciation occurs slowly. It begins, at the start of construction and continues until the building has no useful life remaining. The physical life of a building depends upon the amount and quality of maintenance, and the quality of workmanship and material used in the construction. Buildings constructed to strict specifications with good quality materials will have a much longer useful life than one built without good workmanship or materials.

Functional obsolescence results from the inability of the property to be adequately utilized for the purpose now being employed. Examples of functional obsolescence are; inadequacy, overcapacity, changes in the artistic design to surrounding properties, architecture, types and sizes of rooms, layout and design, traffic pattern, performance standards, etc. Functional obsolescence results form factors within the property itself.

Economic depreciation results from impairment of useful life or desirability arising from sources outside the property such as environmental changes or economic forces which affect supply and demand relationships in the open market. Examples of economic obsolescence are: neighborhood changes, zoning changes, encroachments, lack of utilities, and natural hazards.

Depreciation schedules were established on a useful life basis. It is impossible to design tables to meet depreciation for each individual improvement. The appraiser must use the tables found in each section of this manual as a guide in making a decision for each property.
